

An Office Building in Yokohama

Parker Cook

Digital Photography

After a long day exploring Yokohama, My friends and I were heading to the station to catch the train that would bring us back to Tokyo. Weary and sick of walking, my friends elected to pay for a taxi instead of walking the two miles back to the station whilst I chose to go alone and on foot, and I am really glad I did. The lifeless, dark office buildings that had clouded the skyline during the day were lit up, now providing a fluorescent glow that often even overpowered the street lamps. Seeing these fifty-story monoliths act as moonlight towers for the surrounding area gave off such a surreal, almost cyberpunk feeling. Captured during my solitary two-mile stroll, this photograph showcases the awe-inspiring spectacle of a towering office building and the lambent light it produces.

